A professor in clothing and sustainability, Ingun Grimstad Klepp is an ethnologist with a background in sewing, weaving and textile engineering. Since 1999, she has been working with apparel research at Consumption Research Norway, Oslo Metropolitan University. Her contribution has been key for developing the research field through advancing methods, projects, knowledge and discourse about clothes and their role in society and our lives, including wearing habits, laundry, lifespan, product development and value chains.

Klep actively shares her knowledge through media, exhibitions, debates and popular books and encyclopedia articles. Klepp has received the Norwegian Research Council’s Award for Excellence in Communication of Science.
